Chapter 1 by Will Coloff

Thats it, we lost, no way to win. we are dead, and we almost won too! That idiot hitler was too scared to contenue going so he shot himself, what an idiot, did I call him that already? sigh

Chapter 2 by Harlander

*2 years earlier*

Dr. Bhattacharya closed the window on Subject 387's padded cell. The inmate - a homeless Caucasian of early middle age, whose identity could not be confirmed - had been the first in the worrying trend of a new disease.

Involuntary Historical Reenactment Syndrome, the papers were calling it. Sufferers would withdraw from society, even failing to feed or clean themselves in many cases, and babble constantly, narrating their own personal interpretation of historical events. In many cases, sufferers were vastly ignorant about actual history, so their narration was a bizarre mishmash of half-truths, barely-remembered history classes, and straight-up confabulated nonsense.

No-one understood the reason, but more and more sufferers had appeared over the past year.
